Oh, here we are. Shelter in Place, people staying more at home. I noticed less traffic on the road. I was reading nation magazine just this morning. I don't know if it's the latest one or not, but its talking about how not to waste this crisis, and is looking at five ways that now that we're involved in this and people are paying attention to it and governments are paying attention to this. And it's a pandemic that's on everybody's mind every day. What have we learned?

And in last week, Mr. Trump was talking about we need to start up the economy and we're looking at steps to open up the economy and put people back to work. Then there was other discussion saying well, we don't want to go too fast because it could really rejuvenate the whole pandemic, again, if we jump too soon and open up businesses. So he's looking at it, ok we'll meet with governors of all states and talk about options. And and yes, that discussion needs to happen. And and I think on a tribal level that discussion needs to happen. I don't know if it has. What have we learned? What ways have things altered? And will this be a new normal and what if it is a new normal, then how are we going to adjust to this?

What's coming towards us in another part of that article was, the federal government needs to step in and do much more than it has been been doing in the past 20 or 30 years. What does a peace time lifestyle look like? We are combating terrorism and wars and trying to gain access to oil and transport fossil fuels all over the world. And here we find ourselves in this pandemic, this virus that has a much more of effect than petroleum.

One of the article's sections in that nation magazine were talking about how people have been staying home and canceled meetings. There's no conferences happening, people are using net airlines much less and the air has become cleaner in response. The skies are bluer in some places where there was a lot of smog and a lot of pollution in the air. And just this few months, something happened was that the result of people not flying. So what, what are the possible effects and how will that change our lifestyle? Food for thought. Thanks for listening
